Partners Grieving Differently By Christine Beauchaine

Somewhere between my second and third miscarriages I spent a lot of time on various miscarriage message boards. Most of the people there were very supportive. I noticed that one complaint women posted over and over; they were unhappy over their male partner's response to their loss. Most felt they were grieving a lot more than the guy in their lives. Some women were convinced that he didn't even care at all.

It's important to understand that everybody, male or female, handles grief a bit differently. Everybody has a different perspective based on their situation, their temperament, their upbringing etc. When you add that to the fact that men and women probably handle grief differently, you may feel that your partner's reaction is less than supportive. Before you lament that he doesn't even care about your miscarriage though, consider these points.

First of all, guys aren't exactly encouraged to be emotionally expressive or share their feelings. You may talk extensively about your feelings with your girlfriends but I can pretty much guarantee that's not the sort of thing he discusses with his guy friends. Male friendships aren't wired that way. A recent study about divorce stated that a majority of men consider their wives to be their primary source of emotional support. He may end up feeling like he can't talk about it with you, for fear of upsetting you more. And if he can't talk about it with you, he may not have anybody he can talk to about it.

There's also a strong possibility that he doesn't want to talk about it at all. Don't mistake this as not being supportive of you. Men like to solve problems. My husband sums it up like this: "Why bother talking about a problem you're not able to fix?" He adds, "I don't like to talk about it (my miscarriages) because I can't make it better for you. Then, I feel helpless and I hate to feel helpless!" I'm not saying every guy in the world feels this way but it's a pretty common male attitude.

Don't forget that you have a physical connection with the baby you lost. Your partner doesn't have that. No matter how much he loved the idea of being a dad, no matter how thrilled he was about your pregnancy, the whole thing may seem a little unreal to him. A miscarriage is officially any pregnancy loss prior to twenty weeks gestation, so you may not have been showing and may not felt any of the baby's movements by the time of your loss. These things are clear signs to the outside world (including husbands and boyfriends) of a pregnancy. Without them, a baby may seem like no more than a fond idea.

My husband was upset about my miscarriages but not in the same way I was. I thought for sure I'd be the first person just to turn to dust from sadness. I wondered "can you be this sad and survive?" My husband, on the other hand, was angry at the universe and the powers that be. He was furious that I'd had my heart broken so it wasn't ever that he wasn't upset. He was just upset in a totally different way.

Talk to your partner about how you feel. Don't assume he doesn't care just because he's upset in a different way than you are.

I Will Be Kind
By Audrey Cardany

I will be kind.

I will smile at other mothers' babies.

I will appreciate the laughter and cries of other mothers' babies.

I will share in the joy of others.

Joy comes to us in such wonderful packages, sweet babies.

How could I be angry with another mother who is loving her child and delighting in that love?

I know what she knows; I know the profound nature of motherhood.

We are the same: I love my baby, I delight in loving my baby.

We are different: I experience a mother's worst fear: I grieve my baby's death.

I long to hear her laughter and ache to comfort her cries.

Yet, I am determined.

The joy of others will not diminish me just as the pain of others will not uplift me.

I will remember my own baby and share in another mothers' joy, just as other mothers now share in my sorrow. I will feel the jealousy, the yearning, and the anger and I will acknowledge it as it passes out of me, making way for love to flow in - love that has grown to depths beyond my human understanding since becoming Caitlin Anne's mom. A mother's joy and fulfillment comes from loving. Loving Caitlin burned that lesson into my heart and soul, and I won't allow my new understanding of the nature of love to be destroyed by her death.

I will be kind, because that is the kind of mother Caitlin will have.

Surviving a Baby Shower
By Christine Beauchaine, Bella Online Miscarriage Editor

Along with Spring comes the invitations to baby showers, weddings, and bridal showers. The following article found online at <http://www.bellaonline.com/site/miscarriage> gives families experiencing loss the opportunity to make the right choices for them. We hope this article helps in your decisions to accept and/or decline these invitations.

Silly games. Tiny booties. Pastel cakes with storks on them. What could be better than a baby shower? If you've recently had a miscarriage and you're invited to attend somebody else's baby shower, it can seem more like an afternoon in Perdition than a happy party. How do you survive?

Well, depending on the timing and how close you are to the parents-to-be, you may be able to opt out. Most of these parties ask you to RSVP, so simply say you will be unable to attend. You don't have to go into a lot of detail. People who haven't had experience with miscarriages sometimes have trouble understanding the depth of the grief and loss that goes along with a miscarriage. You don't want to find that you're trying to justify yourself or worse, being talked into attending a party you really can't handle. Trust your instincts. Only you know how broken your heart is and whether or not you can handle this type of festivities. A word of caution, though; you probably won't be able to avoid baby showers for the rest of your life. Take each party one by one and do what you can.

What if you can't possibly avoid a baby shower? That's what happened to me after my third miscarriage. My sister-in-law and I were pregnant at the same time. We were due just three weeks apart. She went on to have my nephew and I lost mine at 17 weeks. I dreaded her baby shower. I was sure I'd be a sobbing heap in the bathroom by the time it was over. Still, I didn't feel like I could not go. It was family. I decided to recruit an ally. My friend Shannon was also attending this shower. I told her point blank how hard the day was going to be for me. She held my hand, made me laugh and was totally my hero that day. I attribute surviving the event directly to her.

I found it was really important for me to have someone acknowledge how difficult that day was for me. It's tough though. I felt like I was walking a fine line between feeling like I was standing up for myself and feeling like one of those "it's all about me" people. Having an ally can make it easier for you. Pick someone ahead of time who will be sympathetic. Don't be afraid to be honest about how you feel. Your ally may be the most supportive person in the world but she won't necessarily be able to read your mind.

Most of all, be gentle with yourself. Somebody else's baby shower may not only bring up all your feelings of grief and loss but jealousy as well. These feelings are normal but they can be tricky to deal with. Do what you need to do to survive.

*Up above, in a place we've yet to explore.
Is where our daughter is forevermore
she joins the others who shouldn't die
And this is where the children fly...*

*They fly so high with wings of gold
Or so our nightly dreams have told
So beautiful, we could not deny..
The place where the children fly...*

*God's Heaven and His Grace
Give warmth and healing in this place
Where strength is given by and by
To all those where the children fly...*

*They're chosen not by race or creed
Just by the Lord's Almighty need
To show us, He can sanctify
A place for where the children fly...*

*And the pain it runs extremely deep
We find it tough, not to weep*

*For our little daughter, who did die
Just to go where the children fly...*

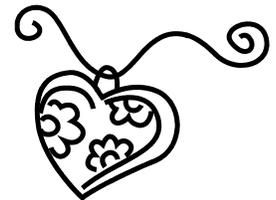

*Parents grieve and families mourn
From them, the children, they are torn
To go with angels who live on high
Because this is where the children fly...*

*Our Daughter, such a precious baby girl
Her presence short but brought us joy
We just can't seem to justify
That she joins them there...
Where the Children Fly....*

We want to thank all of you for being there for us these last 4 years. You all hold a very special place in our heart. As most of you know Ernie and I have been involved with a support group since Dakota's death. Along with all of you, this group has helped us get through some tough days. I know that with out them I wouldn't be where I am today, and wouldn't have had the strength to go on and have Mason and Madisyn. So this year in Memory of Dakota, Ernie and I will donate money to the HOPE Group (Helping Other Parents Endure). We will donate the money on behalf of our family and friends, in memory of Dakota.

*With Love,
Ernie, Christine, Mason and Madisyn Boudreau*

*Stillbirth: A Hidden Hurt
By Anita Creamer*

January 31, 2007

People don't know much about stillbirth. Ten days before her son's due date, Catriona Harris didn't, either.

Then his kicking stopped. Her doctor assured her that the baby still had a heartbeat, but an ultrasound two days later told a different story: Her firstborn, Brady, was dead. After 36 hours in labor, she delivered him on June 17, 2005 -- a perfect, beautiful boy whose umbilical cord had wrapped around his legs, cutting off his oxygen supply.

"It was horrendous," says Harris, now 28, a public relations executive. "My husband and family and best friend were there in the hospital with me. You're supposed to be in the midst of this exciting time, and I was on the labor and delivery floor with all these new mothers.

"But instead of coming home with a new baby, I was planning a funeral. It was heartbreaking."

We don't talk about stillbirth. Maybe we're afraid of scaring pregnant women, though we don't mind warning them about a host of other prenatal dangers.

Catriona Harris wants to share her story, because she wants mothers of stillborns to know they're not alone -- and because she wants pregnant women to monitor their babies' kick counts.

More than we like to think, pregnancies can go very, very wrong. One in 115 American pregnancies ends in stillbirth, which is defined as fetal death past 20 weeks' gestation.

That's 26,000 stillbirths a year or one every 20 minutes. In contrast, sudden infant death syndrome claims about 2,500 children in this country every year.

SIDS organizations, to put it bluntly, have a better marketing strategy.

"I thought stillbirth was something from the 1920s and 1930s," says Harris. "You don't even know that it still happens."

She grew up in Folsom, where her family still lives, and then she moved away -- first to San Francisco, where Brady was born; then to Florida, where her husband's family lives. She and her husband, Mike, 32, now live in Orlando.

"In San Francisco, everybody I came into contact with every day expected me to have a baby," says Harris.

Friends and co-workers knew what had happened, of course. But casual acquaintances -- people she ran into regularly at the coffee shop, the staff at her beauty salon -- assumed she was a new mother.

She was. But her baby was gone.

"You had to relive the story over and over," she says.

It was too much.

After a celebration of life in Brady's honor at Washington Square Park, she and her husband went to the spot on Mount Diablo where he'd proposed to her, and they looked at Brady's picture for the first time. They'd already decided to have another baby right away.

"We'd already prepared our home and our lives for a baby," she says. "We didn't want to replace Brady, but we wanted a child."

In September 2005, just after they moved to Florida, Catriona Harris learned she was pregnant again. Imagine the grief, the joy, the fear.

"I'd gone into my pregnancy with Brady this normal, naive woman," she says. " 'Oh, gosh, what could happen?' "

Now she knew. She called her doctor with every possible question and worry.

At home in Folsom that Christmas, she burst into a long crying jag and shut herself in her room: It was supposed to be her first Christmas with her little boy, after all. Mother's Day was surreal for her, too. She was a mother, but she wasn't.

Born June 1, her daughter, Reilly, is almost 8 months old now. She has three teeth and baby blue eyes, and she's just getting ready to crawl.

From grief and sorrow, new life. And a new cause.

"For so many women, their way of grieving is not to talk about stillbirth," Harris says. "But if we don't talk about it, nobody will be aware of it, and the research won't get done."

What Makes a Mother? Anonymous

I thought of you and closed my eyes
 And prayed to God today
 I asked, "What makes a Mother?"
 And I know I heard him say
 A Mother has a baby
 This we know is true
 But, God, can you be a mother
 When your baby's not with you?
 Yes, you can he replied
 With confidence in his voice
 I give many women babies
 When they leave it is not their choice
 Some I send for a lifetime
 And others for the day
 And some I send to feel your womb
 But there's no need to stay.
 I just don't understand this God
 I want my baby here
 He took a breath
 and cleared his throat
 And then I saw a tear
 I wish I could show you
 What your child is doing Here
 If you could see your child smile
 With other children and say
 "We go to earth to learn our lessons of love and life and fear,
 but My mommy loved me so much
 I got to come straight here!"
 I feel so lucky to have a Mom who had so much love for me
 I learned my lessons very quickly My Mommy set me free.
 I miss my Mommy oh so much
 But I visit her each day
 When she goes to sleep
 On her pillow is where I lay
 I stroke her hair and kiss her cheek
 And whisper in her ear
 "Mommy, Please don't be sad today
 I'm your baby and I am here"
 So you see my dear sweet one
 Your children are okay
 Your babies are here in My home
 And this is where they'll stay
 They'll wait for you with Me
 Until your lessons there are through
 And on the day that you come home they'll be at the gates waiting for you
 So now you see
 What makes a Mother
 It's the feeling in your heart
 It's the love you had so much of Right from the very start

Dandelions from Heaven Anonymous

Mothers day is coming and I wanted to send you a sign something you can tell others; is from an angel of mine
 So I searched the heavens high and low for that perfect thing
 And low and behold I found it;
 and a smile I hope it will bring.

So when you look to the heavens and see the yellow stars in the sky
 Just think of me, your angel, in the heavens way up high
 And just imagine those stars; are dandelions up above.
 Yes! Dandelions are also in heaven;
 which you know how much I love.

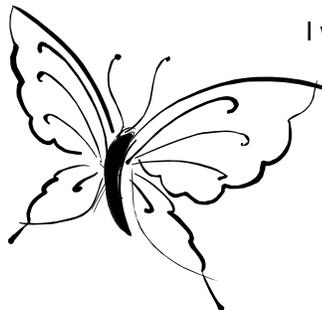

So on this Mothers' Day and you awake and feel blue
 You will notice those yellow stars are no longer in view.
 So look to the meadows and the dandelions you see
 Are the ones I've tossed down this mothers day from me.

And when you find a dandelion
 that has turned from yellow to white;
 You're supposed to make a wish and then blow with all your might.
 For you will be blowing kisses to me in heaven above
 And I will be catching them and blowing them back sent with all my love.

Please know that I am with you on this Mothers' Day
 And also in the days ahead. God and I will never stray.
 We will be with you in the morning when you awake and see the sun
 We will be with you when you say your prayers
 when the day is done.

For God and I will never be very far from your side
 For I can now be everywhere and God will be your guide.
 So remember when you see dandelions
 it is your guarantee
 That I am always close to you for dandelions are free to roam now just like me.

I will always be with you Mummy.
 Happy Mothers Day.
 Love your angel in heaven.

To the families of these children, our sympathies for your recent loss...
